Fines raised to $5, payable within seven days

By GARY REED

A plan raising parking violation fines to $5, payable within seven days, was approved Wednesday by James Madison University President Ronald Carrier and will be implemented at the beginning of the fall semester.

The plan also redesignates 75 student parking spaces in Godwin lot as faculty spaces and calls for more rigorous enforcement of parking regulations.

In approving the plan, Carrier bypassed the Planning and Development Commission which usually ratifies such measures.

Dr. John Mundy, commission chairman, said that it would be difficult to bring the entire commission together during the summer to consider the proposal. In such cases, the president can approve the plan by himself, he said.

Under the plan adopted Wednesday, fines for the first three parking offenses will be $5 and parking privileges will be revoked for the remainder of the school year on the fourth offense. The fines are "due and payable within seven days of the violation."

An earlier proposal under consideration recommended $10 fines for the first offense, $20 for the second, $30 for the third and loss of parking privileges for the fourth.

The plan which was finally accepted was proposed by Student Government Association President Darrell Pile in a letter to Carrier. Both Pile and Commuter Student Committee Chairman Craig Williams wrote Carrier expressing their concern over the increase in parking fines and loss of student parking in Godwin lot.

"The more extreme system which places severe financial burden on students will result in less students being able to pay the fine—even if they want to pay," stated Pile.

The Pile-Williams proposal would be "equally effective" and "can be accepted as being a more understandable penalty," wrote Pile. "It will meet with less student opposition and can be more easily justified than will the more extreme proposed system."

The approved plan states that "the $5 fine for parking violations will be evaluated during the fall semester to determine its efficiency as a deterrent to the prevention of violations."

If the smaller fine is not an effective deterrent then the fine will be increased, said Carrier.

Mundy, who favored a larger fine of $10, said that there are two requirements in having an effective policy. The first is to assess a sufficiently large fine and the second is to make sure that there is a good chance of catching parking violators.

Burrus, Wilson, Miller and Godwin parking lots will be patrolled hourly "between 7:30 a.m. and 8 p.m. Monday through Thursday and between 7:30 a.m. and 6 p.m. Friday for parking regulation enforcement," according to the parking plan.

The plan also states that vehicles persistently violating

Logan, Johnson resign

The director of student activities, James Logan, and the associate director of student affairs, William Johnson, have resigned their posts effective this month.

Logan will leave the university June 30 to go into business with his father, a Harrisonburg contractor.

Logan worked at James Madison University for eight years and taught public school for five years before that.

He said that he had "enjoyed JMU, but wanted a change."

Johnson began his new job as assistant city attorney for Newport News on Monday. He had been at JMU for three years. Part of that time he served as adviser to the Student Government Association.

Johnson was admitted to the Virginia Bar Association in September and said last week that he was "anxious to get back into the courtroom."

Program in fifth year:

Orientation sessions begin

By DWAYNE YANCEY

The first group of some 2200 transfer and freshman students arrived at James Madison University yesterday for a two-day summer orientation program.

During orientation the students will be introduced to the campus, hear a presentation on the JMU Honor System, meet with their advisers and department heads and plan their fall schedule in addition to other meetings and activities.

Practically all of the 1625 incoming freshman are expected at orientation, said Dr. Elizabeth Finlayson, director of student orientation and academic advising, and all but 100 of the 600 transfers.

The JMU summer orientation program now in its fifth year, is different from many college orientations in that parents also attend. Like the students, they stay in dorms and have their own orientation program.

Approximately half of the students who attend orientation will bring either one or two parents, said Finlayson.

The JMU orientation program is also different in that freshman advisors are specially trained to deal with unique problems that freshman encounter and that all students pre-register for

Dalton announces state pay increases

By DWAYNE YANCEY

James Madison University employees will receive a pay increase July 1 as part of the raises for state workers announced last week by Governor John Dalton.

The bulk of JMU workers will receive one-step salary increases of between 4.4 percent and 4.8 percent, said Fred Hilton, assistant to the vice president of public affairs.

Two-step increase that could amount to a 9.6 percent pay raise are in store for various accountants, auditors, computer personnel, clerks and non-professional health care employees.

Salary increases for faculty members will fall in the "eight to nine percent range," said Hilton. They will vary, he said, due to promotion standards and merit rankings used to determine faculty salaries.

The pay raises had been included in the 1978-80 state budget but required gubernatorial action before they took effect.

Dalton said that revenue collections were meeting earlier estimates so that funds were available to implement the pay increases.

The raises are necessary, the governor said, in order that state salaries can keep up with those for similar jobs in the private sector. The two-step increases were aimed at positions where state salaries are lagging drastically behind those in private business.

$36.7 million of the statewide pay raises will come from the general fund, consisting of revenues from sales and income tax. An unspecified amount of "non-general funds" from federal taxes, vehicle license fees, gasoline taxes or other fees will also go toward the pay raises.

Officials have estimated in the past that 40 percent of the money used for state pay raises come from non-general funds.

ARTIST'S CONCEPTION of the new School of Education building.

Ground broken for new building

A ground-breaking ceremony for the new School of Education building, to be located between Logan and Jackson Halls, was held yesterday morning.

On hand for the ceremony were James Madison University president Ronald Carrier, Dean

Julius Roberson of and faculty members of the School of Education, members of the board of visitors, and public school officials from throughout the Shenandoah Valley.

The building, designed to "blend in architecturally" with the bluestone buildings on front campus, will house classrooms, special clinics and other facilities of the School of Education.

Nielsen Construction Co. of Harrisonburg was awarded a $2.4 million contract for construction last week. Completion is scheduled for late next year.

classes at orientation, said Finlayson. "All of our students go home knowing what their schedule will be," she said, noting that at most schools freshmen and transfers indicate their class choices at orientation but do not receive a final schedule until they arrive in the fall.

The 17 faculty members who serve as faculty advisors to freshmen are also paid, said Finlayson, another difference from other orientation programs.

The transfer students will attend orientation in two groups, the first session being yesterday and today and the second on Monday and Tuesday.

Freshman sessions are June 29-30, July 6-7, 10-11, 13-14, 17-18, and 20-21.

The transfers arrive first so that those not planning to live on campus can have time to arrange for off-campus housing, said Finlayson.

Freshmen indicate their life-style choices by mail in the spring and the housing staff works on room assignments throughout the summer.

mer, said Mike Webb, director of residence halls. Freshmen are notified of their room assignments in early August he said.

This year's orientation program has changed little from those in the past.

Orientation sessions begin with advanced placement tests for those freshmen who wish to take them. After a bus tour of the campus, the group is greeted by JMU President Ronald Carrier, hear a discussion on the Honor System and see a multi-media presentation about student life at JMU.

In addition to meetings with department heads, there are also special interest meetings the first day for those interested in athletics, ROTC, the Black Student Alliance, music groups, and fraternities and sororities.

There is also an evening program by the student affairs and business affairs offices on student services, followed by entertainment provided by the University Program Board.

The second day of registration students meet with their faculty advisor to plan their fall schedule, pre-register for classes, and have their ID cards made. Guided tours of the library are also held.

Finlayson noted that there are certain trends among incoming freshman classes in recent years, primarily that JMU is being "overwhelmed with business majors, particularly marketing and management and accounting, and also in communication arts. The numbers there are unbelievable."

About one fourth of all students continue to enter JMU with undeclared majors, she said.

Enrollment down

This year's summer session enrollment at James Madison University has fallen to 1813, a 10 percent drop from last year's record count of 2000.

The undergraduate enrollment is off more sharply than is graduate student registration, according to the summer school office. No figures were available.

Dr. Elizabeth Finlayson, dean of summer school and advising, attributed the decrease in enrollment to an improved job market, "a tremendous number" of students attending summer school at colleges in their home towns and the late sessions in many local public schools.

"There doesn't seem to be a problem with finding jobs this summer," she said, noting that many undergraduates will attend summer school when they are unable to find summer employment.

Many local public school systems had extended sessions to make up for days lost due to the unusually cold winter and had some had not ended by the time the JMU summer session began.

Many teachers who would ordinarily be attending summer school were thus unable to or chose not to because the sessions were so close, said Finlayson.

Parking plan approved

parking and registration regulations will be towed and impounded. "The vehicles may be reclaimed upon payment of a $25 towing fee and all outstanding fines," according to the plan.

The loss of student parking spaces in Godwin lot is necessitated by the loss of faculty spaces in Harrison lot due to construction of the new School of Education building between Jackson and Logan halls.

However, student parking lots are being built on newly purchased land across the railroad tracks from X-parking lot and bordering the new stretch of Cantrell Avenue. There is also a possibility of another parking facility being developed for the fall on the Master's property on the corner of Grace and Main Streets.

Also included in the parking plan is the conversion of the drive in front of Wilson Hall to a pedestrian mall by September, 1980. The drive will be closed while the School of Education building is under construction. After the completion of the education building the street will be converted into a pedestrian mall.

Expensive trips are unwarranted

Governor John Dalton has distinguished himself in his first six months in office as a cost-conscious administrator intent on reducing wasteful and unnecessary spending. Apparently, however, the governor's desire to cut out frivolous expenditures is not so great as to require the sacrifice of his own special privileges of office.

The most noted of the governor's cost-saving measures has been the restrictions placed on out-of-state travel by state employees, a commendable policy.

Two weeks ago, however, the governor himself travelled out of state to attend the Southern Regional Education Board conference in Key Biscayne, Florida. The trip itself was legitimate and necessary. The mode of travel, and Dalton's defense of the same, are not so justified.

A state police cruiser and the governor's limosine were driven to Florida before Dalton arrived in one of the state's twin-engine planes.

The governor came under fire for the travel arrangements when he returned home, and rightly so. The expense of flying a state plane and driving two cars to Florida is unwarranted. A truly cost-conscious governor, and one with an eye toward his public image, would have taken a commercial flight.

The presence of the cruiser and limosine were justified as helpful in transporting Dalton to and from the airport and his various conferences. A taxi would have done the same thing and the fare would have been much less than the cost of taking two cars on a 1,900 mile roundtrip.

An apology for these costly travel arrangements would have promptly ended the discussion. None was forthcoming, though. Instead Dalton defended them. Such statements as "the people of Virginia don't expect their governor to ride a motorcycle or bicycle to Florida" do him no credit. They show him as attempting to evade the central issue.

The question before us is whether money could have been saved without significantly limiting essential services, in this case the governor's safety and comfort. That is the essence of efficient government.

Government cannot be made truly efficient if cost-cutting measures do not apply even to the highest office. When even the governor shows his willingness to sacrifice some of the expensive and unnecessary luxuries of office, then perhaps all levels of government will follow his example by taking a sincere interest in saving money.

'78 won't be replay of '69

By Dwayne Yancey

When is a rematch not a rematch?

Answer: When its Richard Obenshain against Andrew Miller in the 1978 Senate race.

The two have been campaign rivals once before—back in 1969 for attorney general. Miller won that election easily. This time, however, the election may not be so one-sided.

The differences between the 1969 campaign and the 1978 contest are more than just nine years and a different office. The two election years represent opposite ends on the Virginia political continuum.

In 1969 Miller was a new face and enjoyed almost universal support within his party. That was also the year the Republicans broke the nearly century-old Democratic stranglehold on state politics by electing Linwood Holton, a moderate who appealed to disgruntled Democratic liberals, as the successor to Governor Mills Godwin.

Nine years later Miller is an old face whom liberals only grudgingly support. The Democratic domination of state politics has become almost a Republican one. When Obenshain won the GOP nomination over, among others, Holton, one of his chief backers was Mills Godwin.

The general popularity and perceptions of both men with the voters have probably changed little from their first race. An early poll has, in fact, indicated Miller to be some 30 percent ahead of his rival. However, there are sufficient reasons to believe that 1978 will not be a replay of 1969 and that by election time, the race could well be dead even.

The most significant difference between '69 and '78 is the strength and character of the party organization behind each man. The Democratic party is in a state of self-inflicted disarray. Miller is more popular outside his party than within it and so he may be unable to rely on the party structure in certain liberal areas to deliver the vote. Obenshain meanwhile can count on a thoroughly professional GOP organization and almost unlimited financial resources.

The possibility of Henry Howell as governor was enough last year to generate thousands of volunteers and money from business interests for the Dalton campaign. Has the Republican party developed to the extent that it can elect an admittedly weaker candidate even when most voters perceive no threat from the opposition? Both parties should be anxious to determine the exact nature of the GOP's partisan support.

The campaign lines for 1978 have already been drawn.

Andrew Miller will attempt to paint Obenshain as an "extremist" and as "Bill Scott's Clone." Obenshain will run against Jimmy Carter and find Miller guilty by virtue of party association.

These strategies contain several ridiculous propositions which both how Miller handles Obenshain's barbs. Miller, in affecting a statesman-like, "above-politics" stance in last year's gubernatorial primary was usually unable to respond to Howell and visibly uncomfortable when he did. His failure to challenge Howell's rhetoric contributed to his defeat.

Miller has, however, begun this campaign with a surprisingly biting language for his opponent. His strategy is clear—depict Obenshain as a partisan extremist, outside the mainstream of independent Virginia politics while showing himself as a calm and deliberate moderate. He will rely on the trend indicated in 1977 that Virginians will tend to vote for the more moderate candidate.

candidates unfortunately will find appealing. That, Obenshain was Scott's campaign manager in '72 does not make him responsible for the present senator's blunders and Miller, who few can even recall as mentioning the President's name, certainly is even less responsible for Carter.

Jimmy Carter is, of course, fair game for any candidate for Congress. To accuse Miller of supporting the administration line, however, simply because the two happen to belong to the same political party, is tantamount to deception.

While Ronald Reagan and other prominent conservatives will probably appear on Obenshain's behalf, Miller is no doubt hoping that Carter will stay on the other side of the Potomac.

Obenshain is, unlike the sometimes stodgy Miller, an effective campaigner. His piercing style is the kind which easily attracts press attention and will considerably help him in making up the present deficit. It will be interesting to see

While Republicans have often been elected with the help of alienated Democrats, Miller is attempting to copy that approach by attracting Holton moderates. He has repeatedly praised Holton as "a good man," including once at the Democratic convention where the Republican former governor was applauded. Mass public defections are unlikely but the possibility exists that some will not support Obenshain.

Obenshain will focus his campaign on Carter, taxes (he proposes a "massive" tax cut), and the traditional conservative issues of big government and national defense. He will equate Miller with the "big government liberals." The latter's expansion of the attorney general's office is thus likely to come under fire.

Where Miller's campaign will probably dwell on the former attorney general's knowledge of the inner workings of government and "problem solving," Obenshain will deal more with

Audience underestimated

'Something's Afoot': who-done-it spiced with song

By DWAYNE YANCEY

The aim was true but was the target correct?

Director Allen Lyndrup predicted that "Something's Afoot," which opened the second season of James Madison University's Dinner Theatre last week, would be "very light, easy going entertainment, with no thought involved."

Sure enough, it was, and so by that standard it succeeded admirably. However, it may have succeeded too well.

In attempting to find a show which would suit Harrisonburg, those involved in the selection process may have underestimated the community's sophistication. Granted, Harrisonburg is not exactly an ideal town for theatre (Broadway is still a town 12 miles to the north), but it should be able to handle a show of somewhat more substance than the vacuous "Something's Afoot." Surely there are shows a bit more difficult but still easy-going enough to prove palatable enough for even Harrisonburg tastes.

Based loosely on Agatha Christie's "Ten Little Indians," the show is a who-done-it spiced with song. The plot though, just limps along and it is sometime after the first few murders, before any suspense is created. This is partly due to the nature of the show but also partly a problem of the performance.

The tension among cast members is not sufficient to establish an atmosphere of fear and suspicion. Neither are any of the characters built so as to be suspect. At first one is quite convinced that the murderer is not one of the guests and so one gets a feeling of waiting for something to happen, rather than one of of imminent danger. It is here that the show drags. Not until later, when the number of players has been reduced by foul play, does one feel compelled to start asking "who done it?" Up until the very end, in fact, the idea of an outside murderer, rather than one of the guests, seems more plausible.

"Something's Afoot" does indeed have a "surprise ending to end all surprise endings" although there is more surprise in how the last deaths occur than who the actual murderer is.

In aiming for light-hearted fare, perhaps not enough attention was devoted to the more serious aspects of the show. Fear can be funny if presented the right way. In "Something's Afoot," however, there seemed to be no attempt.

Objections to the flimsiness of the story aside, the performance itself proved to be quite fun, in spite of occasional flaws.

There is more comedy in what is done with the characters than in what is inherent in the script. Thus much of the humor is derived from personalities, rather than events.

Although all roles are well cast, Steve Clark as the career army officer and Nancy Googins as the officious Miss Tweed must be mentioned here as making the most of their characters. While Clark might have been played up more, and made even more comically deliberate, it may have distracted from the rest of the show.

Googins was particularly theatrical, and her constant flapping of her arms made her resemble a mother hen chasing chicks. Tweed kept her brood in order, even when that seemed to be impossible.

Googins distinguished herself vocally as well as theatrically, as did Debbie Zirkle (Hope) and John Little (Nigel). The accompanist, Marlene Shumaker, must also be cited here for her musical abilities.

Most of the other actors were also notable, including Anne Lyndrup (Lady Rancour), Susan Burrell (Lettie), Flint (Bob Kirkpatrick), Geoffrey (Steve King) and made Lettie resemble Eliza Doolittle in "My Fair Lady."

There is much attention paid to minor items, such as the chamber pot, shoes whenever the musical's title is mentioned, and other various and sundry items. If anything, they received an inordinate amount of care, at the expense of the overall impact of the show.

The blocking, which can become a problem with ten actors and a small stage, is handled well. There is lots of movement, particularly during songs, and most of it purposeful. Avoided are simplistic, static lines.

The stage is set up better than last year, so that the room is made to look as much like an actual dinner theatre as possible. The buffet has also been improved over the first year and is not what most JMU students have come to expect in the d-hall. It's actually real food, not institutional servings.

The dinner theatre offers a pleasant way to spend a summer evening, enjoying fine food and a fun show in air-conditioned comfort. If you accept the target, then the aim is one to be appreciated.

"Something's Afoot" continues June 22-24, 26-27, July 11, 14-15, 17-20, 25, 28-29, and 31. The second dinner theatre show, "Scapino!" opens June 29 and will run June 30, July 1, 1-8, 10, 13, 18, 21-22, 24, 27 and August 1, and 4-5.

Admission is $7 for adult, $5 for children under 12 and JMU summer students without d-hall contracts, and $3 for those with d-hall contracts.

Students must make reservations in advance and should bring their student ID and proof of d-hall contract to the performance. Only 25 students will be admitted at a reduced price per show, so make your reservations early.

Jerry Long (Dr. Graybury).

The only player who had some difficulty was Steve Wagner (Clive), who tended to deliver his lines stiffly, as if he were reciting them rather than acting them. Further performances should help him become more comfortable on stage.

In musicals the questions always tends to arise of whether the "music people" can act better than the "theatre people" can sing. Once again, the answer is shown to be yes.

Unlike most plays where actors must affect English accents, this cast succeeds in doing so. Susan Burrell's constant dropping of h's and sounding a's like i's, the dialect of the lower class English, was the most authentic and hence the most effective. In many ways she

New Cantrell Avenue link opened

The new section of Cantrell Avenue, between Mason and Paul Streets, was opened Monday.

The portion links two older parts of Cantrell Avenue. The completed street provides a more direct route between U.S. 33 East (East Market Street) and Rt. 42 (High Street). Traffic between those two roads can now bypass downtown Harrisonburg.

The new section of Cantrell runs eastward from Mason Street, past the Rockingham Memorial Hospital and the Wine-Price Building, curves parallel to the Chesapeake and Western Railroad tracks and intersects Paul Street near the northern exit to X-Lot.

Seven acres of land between Cantrell and the railroad tracks is owned by the Madison Foundation and will be the site of new parking facilities.

emotional issues designed to produce a "gut reaction" with the voters.

The tone of the campaign may have been set last week when Miller flew off on a "fact-finding mission" to Europe and the Mideast while Obenshain chided him for ignoring the problems of Virginia that are closer to home.

Both candidates are woefully lacking in an understanding of both foreign affairs and the legislative process. Only Miller has held public office, that being only seven years in the attorney general's office in Richmond.

The advantage now lies with Miller because of his higher name recognition. The momentum, however, will be on Obenshain's side once the fall campaigning begins.

Then the election may become a contest between Miller's favorable image and Republican organization.

Who will win?

Answer: Never bet on elections in June.

JMU baseball players sign with National league teams

By HOLLY WOOLARD

James Madison University is rapidly becoming the baseball player factory of Virginia.

With the recent pro signings of juniors Dan Prior and J.W. Mitchell, the Dukes have now sent six players to professional clubs within the past three years.

Prior, a transfer student from New York who only competed for JMU one season, signed with the Philadelphia Phillies. The pitcher compiled a 3-2 record during 1978 and was drafted in the ninth round.

Mitchell, named JMU's Most Outstanding Defensive Player last season, signed with the Chicago Cubs. The shortstop accumulated a .386 career batting average while starting for the Dukes during the last three years.

"I have always said I would rather have outstanding players for three years and lose them to the draft, than have average players for four years," said JMU baseball coach Brad Babcock this week.

Having six players from JMU sign pro-contracts, helps in recruiting, said Babcock. The four previous players that turned pro eventually returned to school to finish their education, he said.

One of Babcock's latest recruits, one who chose to pursue an education rather than play pro ball, is incoming freshman Russ Dickerson.

Dickerson, an infielder who graduated in June from Harrisonburg High School was drafted in the 22nd round by the Baltimore Orioles.

"I feel it is a great honor to be drafted," said Dickerson, "but getting an education is most important." He plans to study accounting at JMU.

Dickerson also lettered in football and basketball in high school, but chose to play baseball because he considers it his best sport.

Dickerson said he accepted the full athletic scholarship from JMU for many reasons, but one is "because it has the best baseball program in the state." Another reason he cited is that he will get a chance "to play in front of the people from Harrisonburg for the next four years," unless he is drafted sooner.

JMU PRESIDENT RONALD CARRIER proved to local residents that he is a swinger, as he and his partner upset their way into the finals of the intermediate division of the Heart Fund Tournament this past weekend.

Disabled athletes compete in National Games

James Madison University hosts many national tournaments and the competition is always very impressive. The competition does not compare, however, with the enthusiasm and achievement of participants in the 22nd National Wheelchair Games held here last weekend.

Over 90 records fell during the 275-event, three-day affair. "That is the largest number of records broken in any of the National Wheelchair Games," said tournament director Joe Little.

More than 400 disabled individuals from 35 states competed in the games, which included table tennis, archery, swimming, weight lifting, track and field events.

The events are classified in seven categories ranging from one-A, which is for the most disabled, to class five. Muscular damage is usually the determining factor for classifications.

One paraplegic woman from New York finished her 400 yard swim approximately two minutes behind her class three competitors. The fans cheered exuberantly as the young handicapped swimmer lifted her head with an ear to ear grin.

The spectators and the competitor were not excited because a new world record had been established. Everyone was rejoicing because the swimmer, who had no use of her legs, had completed 16 laps without stopping.

This particular incident is typical of the Wheelchair Games. The excitement of each event is thrilling, as many disabled athletes accomplish feats which even the physically able never attempt.

Marcella Hamlin, a 19 year-old from the University of California-Santa Barba, placed first in the 400 yard swim and third in the 100. She recorded a time of 6:21 in the 400.

Hamlin, an attractive young woman, lost her left leg at the age of 12 when doctors discovered she had bone cancer of the lower femur.

"I use to just swim for fun," she said, but a friend told me about competition for the handicapped and I went for it."

Although the National Wheelchair Games was only her third meet, the California girl "practiced a couple of miles a day" to prepare for her races. "I would like to increase my workouts to 6,000 yards a day between now and next year," said Hamlin.

Hamlin competes in class six, a special swimming division for athletes that can push off the wall. All swimmers begin the races in the water.

Another outstanding disabled athlete is George Murray from Tampa, Florida, who won the wheelchair division of the Boston Marathon. Murray's time was only 16 minutes slower than the winning runner's time of two hours and 10 minutes.

"I had never run the course before," said Murray. "Next year my time will be faster."

Murray entered the Boston Marathon because of "the challenge of the distance." This past weekend he competed in the mile, placing fifth. The winner of that event turned in a time of 5:22, which set a national record.

"I like the training and feeling good," said Murray. "You can compete against yourself and if you improve, you can't complain."

Murray, a paraplegic for 16 years, practices in parks and on tracks. He admits that people are surprised to see him roll along, but "the reactions are generally good."

The Wheelchair Games allow many individuals the chance to compete in athletics. Goals are set, but more importantly, goals are accomplished.

Wrestling coach hired

James Madison University Athletic Director Dean Ehlers has named Dick Besnier as head wrestling coach at JMU effective August 1.

Besnier will replace Jim Prince who will devote his full attention to his duties as an assistant football coach at JMU. Besnier was a part-time assistant in the JMU wrestling program during the 1977-78 season.

Besnier was the head wrestling coach at the College of William and Mary from 1965-73. He started the wrestling program at William and Mary and had a dual meet record of 72-19.

Besnier's teams won four Southern Conference championships and four Virginia Intercollegiate Tournament team championships. He coached 32 Southern Conference individual champions, four Southern Conference Outstanding Wrestlers, and Mark Belknap, a two-time All-America, at William and Mary.

"We feel that Dick made a very valuable contribution to our wrestling program last year as a part-time assistant," Ehlers said. "I think his past record indicates that he is a very successful coach and we're very happy to have him join our staff on a full-time basis."

"I think that the wrestling program at James Madison University has a bright future," Besnier said. "I can't tell you how excited I am about this position. I think it's an excellent opportunity."

Personal

OWL: How goes it in the north country? The Afghanistan Anarchist Front has declared a boycott of all Harrisonburg grocery stores until they start stocking rhubarb. In the meantime, I've baked up a breeze pie: a little ink, some paper, and lots of insanity, anarchy and bizzarity. Not to mention weirdness. Don't forget those immortal words: necks are red, violets are blue... The McGaheysville Anarchist.

MY LADY LUCK The weekend was GREAT. We shall have a similar 'engagement' soon. F

FE. Congrats. Obviously well cast, it was a very pragmatic performance, being both mature and optimistic. The shoe laces even matched the set but the crotch thrusting was a bit too dramatic. Break a limb, but don't stop the bus to do it. E and EE.
