PROMOTING CIVIC ENGAGEMENT THROUGH ACADEMIC LIBRARY OUTREACH PROGRAMS

GOAL AND CONTEXT:

At James Madison University, civic engagement is one of three key components of the university’s vision. The libraries at JMU therefore try to support and promote civic engagement through our outreach to the campus and community.

We wanted to learn more about how other libraries in our state promote civic engagement. We were also interested in exploring the connections among civic literacy, information literacy, and library outreach.

METHODS:

Compiled a list of all 38 universities and colleges in Virginia.

Emailed IRB-approved survey to each library’s outreach manager or similar position (or, if no such position existed, to a library director, dean, or associate dean).

14 respondents (37% response rate) completed the web-based survey.

Summarized quantitative data in bar charts. Examined qualitative data (answers to open-ended questions) for themes.

RESULTS:

12 out of the 14 academic libraries have interest or have participated in hosting civic engagement events.

The lack of resources and library space has been a recurring problem.

Partly because of these challenges, most of the libraries surveyed have collaborated with other school-sponsored civic organizations, or permitted these groups to use library space, to help engage with their patrons.

Notable challenges our surveyed libraries faced were associating civic engagement with their library and deep partisanship among their patrons.
