In Memoriam

Today the flag is at half mast.

Nothing else seems very different—students laugh and call to each other as they go on their way. A color guard bell rings every hour, the clock on Wilco is ten minutes behind time, the step to the third floor is just as steep. But around the corner on the second floor there is something that is different, just inside an open office door there is an occupied desk. Otherwise, it is, in the same. There is a picture of two boys, obviously brothers, smiling at the one who snapped the camera, a glass of pencils of all sizes scattered about. Ready for use, a memorandum with scribbled pages turned over to a fresh lead, books dealing with the hydra in French and German titles, and a jar that has run out of the candy usually in it.

The room is different today because there is no talk of football at the desk, or leaning at the window with one foot on the radiator, back to the room, holding a smoking cigarette and whistling.

Dr. Carl H. McConnell was a great man. He was unaffected by his attainments, friendly with all, and he had a philosophy of life which from he never ceased to admire. He was successful in life because he had a personality and the manner of a gentleman. He had contributed in a definite way to the field in which he interested lay and he had a philosophy of life from which he never ceased to admire. He was successful in life because he had a personality and the manner of a gentleman.

He had been teaching here only a short time, two years this fall, but he was a favorite professor of those who had studied under him and those who knew him only by reputation. When death came, so young the thought that rises to mind is the pity of having cut so short. But Dr. McConnell's life was a success. He had achieved at an age when few men ever achieve.

He had contributed in a definite way to the field in which he interested lay and he had a philosophy of life from which he never ceased to admire. He was successful in life because he had a personality and the manner of a gentleman.
