

Adopt-A-Minefield:

by Nahela Hadi [Executive Director, Adopt-A Minefield/UNA-USA]

FOCUS

In 1998, following the signing of the Ottawa Convention, the United Nations Association of the USA (UNA-USA) began developing a program to address the landmine issue. The challenge was UNA-USA wanted to do more than just raise awareness of the landmine problem. We did not want to leave people without the ability to act once they had learned about the problem and felt compelled act. We wanted to do something different through a program that would engage civil society in clearing minefields. Thus, the Adopt-A-Minefield (AAM) campaign was born.

Based on the Adopt-A-Highway program, the AAM model allows donors to "adopt" specific minefields and raise the necessary funds to clear them. The aim was to work with strong and effective partners in the field who could nominate high-priority minefields for clearance, clear the sites with funds that were raised, and forward pre- and post-clearance reporting, as well as clearance certificates. Given UNA's varied constituencies from individual members in 175 chapters across the United States to member organizations, businesses and others, we knew that our strength was in developing and implementing creative outreach programs to engage all constituencies.

With this in mind, we created formal partnerships with the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) to implement our program in the field and with Ted Turner's Better World Fund, which saw in AAM a unique opportunity to actively engage the grassroots in a pressing international issue. The Better World Fund established a 25-cents-to-the-dollar match to cover administrative costs and allow AAM to forward 100 percent of mine clearance donations to the United Nations and AAM's partners in the field. Additionally, the U.S. Department of State saw that AAM provided an important mechanism for generating additional funding for the field of mine action and therefore provided vital start-up funds to help us establish the program. With these partners by our side, UNA-USA set out to develop what is today the largest grassroots mine action campaign raising funds to clear landmines and help landmine survivors.

In March 1999, AAM was formally launched to raise awareness of the global landmine crisis and to raise funds for mine clearance in Afghanistan, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Cambodia, Croatia, and Mozambique. Our biggest challenge was engaging the general public in a problem that does not exist in the United States. In fact, most people had only become aware of the landmine problem as a result of Princess Diana's publicized trips to minefields in protective gear. Following her death and the decreased media attention to the issue, most people quickly forgot about landmines.

The first group of donors to join AAM in its efforts was the UNA chapters across the country. Because of their explicit interests in foreign policy and the world beyond our borders, UNA members immediately understood the issue and the goals of AAM and became spokespeople in their own communities. As a result of this strong network, schools, local businesses, churches, temples and civic organizations became involved in local AAM campaigns. Before long, chapters were raising $20,000 to $30,000 (U.S.) to clear fields that they had adopted. Additionally, because of the chapters' local efforts, several churches and Rotary clubs started their own separate efforts to raise funds for AAM. Today, grassroots contributions constitute one-third of AAM's overall dona-

About a year after the launch of AAM, we were approached by the Canadian Landmine Foundation with a proposal to partner with us to bring AAM to Canada. While the culture of philanthropy in the United States is unmatched by others, the AAM model can easily be adapted to different countries. In late summer of 2000, AAM (Canada) was launched in Toronto.

Later, in the fall of 2000, Lady Heather Mills McCartney and Sir Paul McCartney joined AAM as Goodwill Ambassadors and Patrons. Heather had long been involved in the landmine issue starting during the war in the former Yugoslavia. Then, when she lost her own leg in a motorcycle accident in London, she became an even more passionate advocate, particularly for landmine survivors. Both she and Paul felt that AAM was the perfect vehicle to raise global awareness of the landmine problem and to raise new funds for mine action. In addition to bringing her name to the cause, Heather brought a new dimension to our work, adding survivor assistance to our mandate. In the spring of 2001, our second partner campaign, AAM (UK), was launched in partnership with the UNA of the United Kingdom at a ceremony hosted by Paul and Heather.

Having partner campaigns and high-profile Goodwill Ambassadors/Patrons helped springboard AAM to a new level. The celebrity of Paul and Heather naturally brought media attention, which in turn brought the landmine issue to people whom we had not yet reached through our grassroots campaigns. Our coalition work was also enhanced by the efforts of our campaign partners in Canada and the United Kingdom. In particular, AAM (Canada) concentrated its efforts on Rotary clubs across Canada, which in turn further increased the involvement of Rotary clubs in the
